

When light enters a rainbow droplet it is first refracted, then it has a small (~6%?) chance of being reflected internally, after which it will refract once more and come out at a different angle. The angle between the original path of the light and the final path is known as the deviation, and is obviously dependent on the original angle relative to the droplet.

See for more.